Notebook on Cities and Clothes

Wim Wenders is perhaps the most cosmopolitan filmmaker to have emerged out of the vibrant period of New German Cinema. Wenders grew up with a steady diet of American popculture – a catalyst that sparked a ceaseless fascination with the international cultural landscape around him which he sought to express through his films. As Wim Wenders once said, “Everything I love I had to defend”. From the last days of American film director Nicholas Ray, the first international performances of Cuban music sensation Buena Vista Social Club, to the memories of choreographer Pina Bausch immortalised by her ensemble of dancers – these documentaries all feature individuals in states of transitions and events in the act of unfolding. As he celebrates his 70th birthday next year, join us for this special showcase of Wenders’ documentaries which tell the tales of fellow travellers and his ceaseless love for music, cinema, photography, fashion, dance and architecture.

ON THE ROAD: THE DOCUMENTARIES OF WIM WENDERS

“People around the globe have seen my films, many have been influenced by them, and some of these films have become classics or cult films. In this sense they no longer belong to me anyways, but instead to a collective memory of cinema-goers of every age and many nationalities.

It has been my desire for many years that in the future my work might belong only to itself, and thus to everyone. There is now a realistic and unique opportunity for this dream to come true.”

– Wim Wenders
